

Classic movies and live action reboots – Gaby 7D

I have found myself watching a lot more of the classics rather than the newer films recently, when a new blockbuster comes out, sure I'll take a peek, but when watching something like an old animation, it gives me a sort of buzz in my heart which I can't explain. Some would say this is just because maybe I haven't grown up watching new movies or maybe I haven't adapted to the new gesture of movie watching. All I can say to that is no, not really. I believe the real reason I feel this way, and I'm sure many others do to, is because something is so great about nostalgia. Some of my youngest memories were watching films like Snow White, Cinderella, Chitty Bang Bang you name it I've probably seen it at least ten times. And although many would say those animations and movies are old and we've build a much newer generation around us, when I see these kinds of movies I just feel like I have an aspect to relate to that others can't.

Modern live-action remakes have been used left and right for a few years. Personally, while sure it's cool to see a classic re-told in the "real world", it comes to a point where it seems like a cheap holder they use once they have run out of ideas to make money. Hey, in a few years Disney probably would have made all there films to live-action. Before you start to complain because you believe that live-actions are the best thing that happened to the world, let me explain. So as you may not know, Mulan is getting a live-action reboot. A lot of people are very excited (even me) to see the beloved tale retold but with many remakes, some are worried it will fail to reach the beautiful story making and dedication of the original movie. We still have a few years to wait though so even if you do like the reboots Disney has plenty to offer right now.

All I can really say to end this is that you've got to remember, this is just my opinion. If you love the classics, "Hey, me too!"

And even if you've never been into classics and love the new age of movies then "Go you!" After all, the world would be boring if we were all the same...
